The latest hardcover upcountry tale from Chute is as grimly realistic and brutal—and as disjointed—as its two predecessors (The Beans of Egypt, Maine, 1985, and Letourneau's Used Auto Parts, 1988). Poverty and despair abound in Egypt, Maine, where the escapades of two generations of Barringtons and Johnsons provide a patchwork of fierce, often self-destructive eccentricity.

Carolyn Chute's sentences are like hand-made furniture with carefully chiseled dove tail joints. This thick book packs in plenty of colorful whimsy but essentially it ends like a loud howl of agony. Written in the 90's, the message is similar to that of the Occupy Wall Street group concerning how people are being squashed like bugs by corporate greed and a failed health care system.
